Farming in New England is unpredictable at best. Poor weather conditions, pests, a low producing crop, as well as many other factors can affect the actual size of the harvest. We make every effort to mitigate risks through crop diversity, multiple field selection, and use only the best quality seeds and plants. Members need to be aware however; that some items may be later than predicted and/or quantities may be limited. In the event of a low producing crop we may need to limit selection, so all members can enjoy some of the harvest.

We have made every effort to make sure that all our production and food handling practices are of the highest quality. Food is picked the same day it is available. Even with all of our efforts there will be some risk associated with handling food. You can minimize that risk by following a few important tips located online at www.visitthefarm.com.

Check online for regular updates at www.visitthefarm.com as well as additional terms and conditions.
